Five Servings of New York Kitchen This weekend, we are one of several inaugural culinary school graduates celebrating in the Big Apple with a series of launches in the culinary universe. The first event of our five-day restaurant tour was a visit to Five Servings, the top-rated celebrity chef-owned restaurant and bar in New York City. Three of our classmates—Fanny Arocha, Kharyn Coy, and Tony Galeone—were leading the charge and we were there to see what's what. A Lesson in Pizza Our first lesson of the night was in how to make a perfect pizza. The menu had an explanation of the system for the chefs that would be in charge of making the pizza, but since we were just there to eat it, the chef-owner Kharyn Coy took it upon himself to explain the different components of a perfectly-formed slice. What makes a "New York-style" pizza, you ask? It's a wooden peel that has been hand-carved from a massive block of oak, seasoned by a special blend of oils, and rolled around a rotary oven heated to 500 degrees. This process produces a crispy edge that creates a perfect seal around the outside of the pizza. At the end of the video, when Kharyn does the math and tells us how many calories in the pizza, he also tells us that the pizza itself is essentially free. The Final Product The pizza was served with a cool Italian red. It was an excellent complement to the pizza, but I'll spare you the details. After we took a few bites, the group of friends got back on the topic of the new restaurant, which was served with a taste of its most recent cocktail. A Dessert for Our Last Meal Since we had been touring and eating the previous two days, and had just a few hours to spare before 82157476af
